The New York Times reported: The administration said Wednesday that it was extending a policy allowing the United States to strike suspected members of al Qaeda who were known or believed to be members of the Islamic State (also known as ISIS or ISIL) or al Qaeda but had not previously been found in terrorism courts. The move was required by the court-martial decisions of the Bush and Obama administrations that expanded the authority to attack members of al Qaeda who were being held as enemy combatants but had not been linked to terrorism. The Obama administration said it would allow those targeted to speak to military prosecutors before they were notified in advance of the strike, allowing them to deny they participated in violence..

At a conference in Washington DC on Thursday, former Defense Department officials condemned the drone program and said its expansion was part of the government's expansion of use of targeted killing, or targeted killing. The former officials also criticized the fact that the Obama administration was trying to extend the use of targeted assassinations, rather than just the killing of suspected terrorists as originally planned, which it had originally tried to do. However, former senior officials told the Times they expected continued use of drones, as President-elect Donald Trump has promised on the campaign trail.. music downloaders.
